CHAPTER ONE

The train pulled into the station just after midnight. Mara stepped onto the platform, her breath clouding in the cold air. She checked the map her brother had sent her, then folded it away and looked up at the long dark line of the hills.

“You’re late,” said a voice behind her. She turned, and for a long moment neither of them spoke. The station clock ticked above them, loud in the empty hall, and somewhere a door banged in the wind.

“Sorry,” she said at last. “The trains were all delayed by the flooding further down the valley.”

The train pulled into the station just after midnight. Mara stepped onto the platform, her breath clouding in the cold air. She checked the map her brother had sent her, then folded it away and looked up at the long dark line of the hills.

“You’re late,” said a voice behind her. She turned, and for a long moment neither of them spoke. The station clock ticked above them, loud in the empty hall, and somewhere a door banged in the wind.

“Sorry,” she said at last. “The trains were all delayed by the flooding further down the valley.”

The train pulled into the station just after midnight. Mara stepped onto the platform, her breath clouding in the cold air. She checked the map her brother had sent her, then folded it away and looked up at the long dark line of the hills.

“You’re late,” said a voice behind her. She turned, and for a long moment neither of them spoke. The station clock ticked above them, loud in the empty hall, and somewhere a door banged in the wind.

“Sorry,” she said at last. “The trains were all delayed by the flooding further down the valley.”

The train pulled into the station just after midnight. Mara stepped onto the platform, her breath clouding in the cold air. She checked the map her brother had sent her, then folded it away and looked up at the long dark line of the hills.

“You’re late,” said a voice behind her. She turned, and for a long moment neither of them spoke. The station clock ticked above them, loud in the empty hall, and somewhere a door banged in the wind.

“Sorry,” she said at last. “The trains were all delayed by the flooding further down the valley.”

CHAPTER TWO

The train pulled into the station just after midnight. Mara stepped onto the platform, her breath clouding in the cold air. She checked the map her brother had sent her, then folded it away and looked up at the long dark line of the hills.

“You’re late,” said a voice behind her. She turned, and for a long moment neither of them spoke. The station clock ticked above them, loud in the empty hall, and somewhere a door banged in the wind.

“Sorry,” she said at last. “The trains were all delayed by the flooding further down the valley.”

The train pulled into the station just after midnight. Mara stepped onto the platform, her breath clouding in the cold air. She checked the map her brother had sent her, then folded it away and looked up at the long dark line of the hills.

“You’re late,” said a voice behind her. She turned, and for a long moment neither of them spoke. The station clock ticked above them, loud in the empty hall, and somewhere a door banged in the wind.

“Sorry,” she said at last. “The trains were all delayed by the flooding further down the valley.”

The train pulled into the station just after midnight. Mara stepped onto the platform, her breath clouding in the cold air. She checked the map her brother had sent her, then folded it away and looked up at the long dark line of the hills.

“You’re late,” said a voice behind her. She turned, and for a long moment neither of them spoke. The station clock ticked above them, loud in the empty hall, and somewhere a door banged in the wind.

“Sorry,” she said at last. “The trains were all delayed by the flooding further down the valley.”

The train pulled into the station just after midnight. Mara stepped onto the platform, her breath clouding in the cold air. She checked the map her brother had sent her, then folded it away and looked up at the long dark line of the hills.

“You’re late,” said a voice behind her. She turned, and for a long moment neither of them spoke. The station clock ticked above them, loud in the empty hall, and somewhere a door banged in the wind.

“Sorry,” she said at last. “The trains were all delayed by the flooding further down the valley.”

CHAPTER THREE

The train pulled into the station just after midnight. Mara stepped onto the platform, her breath clouding in the cold air. She checked the map her brother had sent her, then folded it away and looked up at the long dark line of the hills.

“You’re late,” said a voice behind her. She turned, and for a long moment neither of them spoke. The station clock ticked above them, loud in the empty hall, and somewhere a door banged in the wind.

“Sorry,” she said at last. “The trains were all delayed by the flooding further down the valley.”

The train pulled into the station just after midnight. Mara stepped onto the platform, her breath clouding in the cold air. She checked the map her brother had sent her, then folded it away and looked up at the long dark line of the hills.

“You’re late,” said a voice behind her. She turned, and for a long moment neither of them spoke. The station clock ticked above them, loud in the empty hall, and somewhere a door banged in the wind.

“Sorry,” she said at last. “The trains were all delayed by the flooding further down the valley.”

The train pulled into the station just after midnight. Mara stepped onto the platform, her breath clouding in the cold air. She checked the map her brother had sent her, then folded it away and looked up at the long dark line of the hills.

“You’re late,” said a voice behind her. She turned, and for a long moment neither of them spoke. The station clock ticked above them, loud in the empty hall, and somewhere a door banged in the wind.

“Sorry,” she said at last. “The trains were all delayed by the flooding further down the valley.”

The train pulled into the station just after midnight. Mara stepped onto the platform, her breath clouding in the cold air. She checked the map her brother had sent her, then folded it away and looked up at the long dark line of the hills.

“You’re late,” said a voice behind her. She turned, and for a long moment neither of them spoke. The station clock ticked above them, loud in the empty hall, and somewhere a door banged in the wind.

“Sorry,” she said at last. “The trains were all delayed by the flooding further down the valley.”